

Environmental Communication:

A Journal of Nature and Culture

Official journal of the International Environmental Communication Association

New Editor-in-Chief Announcement

Routledge is delighted to announce the appointment of Alison Anderson, Plymouth University, UK, as the New Editor-in-Chief of Environmental Communication, with effect from January 1st 2014.

Professor Anderson will be familiar to many readers of the journal as a leading international scholar in the field and author of numerous publications, including the seminal book Media, Culture and the Environment (Rutgers University Press, USA and UCL - University College London, UK). She holds a PhD from the University of Greenwich and is Director for the Centre for Culture, Community and Society, Plymouth University, and a Fellow of the Royal Society of Arts.

During 2013-2014 she will work alongside Professor Steve Depoe as co-editor during the period of editorial transition. We thank Steve for his sterling work over the past 6 years and extend a warm welcome to Alison, wishing Environmental Communication every continued success under her leadership. Building on the excellent foundations that have already been established, her vision is to widen its international scope and make it the leading interdisciplinary journal in this increasingly important area of scholarship.

Environmental Communication publishes high-quality, peer-reviewed scholarship that examines theories, practices, and processes of communication as they relate to the environment around the world. As such, the journal serves as a nexus, a place of global connection and conversation, among scholars working in and across a variety of disciplines who explore how humans communicate about and within both natural and cultural environments.

